Not illustrated. 1905 Excerpt: . a thermal gradient extending from the high temperature of the alcohol flame down to the temperature of the incoming water of the heat-absorbing system. In this case great heat is concentrated at one point, while the cooling area, i. e., the area of the absorbers, is quite extensive. In the case of experiments with man we have a body temperature, which on the surface is not far from 330, affecting a relatively large area, and a cooling area similar to that during the alcohol check experiments. In severe work experiments we have the body more or less exposed and the temperature of the absorbing system cooled nearly to zero. It is therefore difficult to see how the electrical resistance thermometers, distributed as shown in figure 33, can in any way assume accurately the average temperature of the air in the whole chamber. During rest experiments and...
