In particular, they must be able to reason about what they need to know in order to perform an action, and how to get the information that they need. This paper presents a formalism which is expressive enough to describe these reasoning processes. We demonstrate that for our purposes, a first order logic of knowledge is superior to a modal logic of knowledge. Next, we describe the paradoxes that result from a first-order approach, and show how we can resolve them. Finally, we present a simple model of action and propose a solution to the knowledge preconditions problem based on our integrated theory of knowledge and action.
