Every trade or industrial union is re uired to comply with the legal regulations concerning all corporate bodies. Vhen this is done they are registered by the state and empowered to act in cases of dispute, penalties being imposed on the union, with liability on the individual members, in case of violation of any of the provisions of the act. Without going into details of the law, the plan may be understood from an outline of its leading features. New Zealand is divided into six industrial districts, in each of which is a board of conciliation, composed of four or six members and a chairman. The members are elected by the unions, the employers unions electing half the members, and the workmen s unions the other half. These members choose an impartial person outside of their own number to act as chairman. The members serve for three years, but are eligible for re-election. The chairman does not vote except in case of a tie vote, his position being similar to that of the vice-president of the United States when presiding over the senate. Disputes may be brought before the board of conciliation by an individual employer or an employer s or workingmen s union or association of unions, or by an industrial agreement between the contending parties. The board goes into the question very thoroughly, and is clothed with full powers for eliciting facts and preserving order during the inquiry. It is required...
